Counting

Students check which colour is their dominant colour.

It can happen that someone does not have a clearly dominant 'colour'. Personality is a complex structure, therefore it cannot be divided into fixed types. Personality types help us to classify people; however, we cannot forget that everyone is different – even people within one personality type.

Students check which colour is their dominant colour.

People differ from one another – they feel, think and act in different ways.

Here is just a set of examples:

- someone feels convenient as a leader while another person doesn't like it;
- some people like to plan everything and some prefer to act on impulse;
- some people are expressive with their feelings, and some are not.

All the above examples describe personality traits.

A personality type is a set of traits that often go together.
